Press Releases

10.30.2026

Amy Pearl's journey at Archer began as a summer associate and has grown into a career shaped by meaningful client relationships, collaboration, and a commitment to practical problem-solving. In recognition of her recent promotion to partner, we asked Amy to reflect on her path, what drives her work, and the perspective she brings to serving clients.

Making partner is a significant milestone. What does it mean to you personally?

I've been with Archer since I was a summer associate, so becoming partner means a lot. I've been fortunate to learn from exceptional mentors and work with talented colleagues along the way. I'm excited to step into this new role and continue serving our clients while contributing to the firm's continued growth.

What drew you to law in the first place, and is that still what drives you today?

I've always enjoyed working through complex problems to reach practical solutions. What drew me to the law was the opportunity to apply that mindset while helping others navigate critical moments. Whether I'm advising a business or a public sector client, I'm still driven by bringing clarity to complicated issues.

When a client comes to you in the middle of a dispute, what is usually the first thing you help them see more clearly?

I usually try to get everyone to take a step back. A dispute can become all-consuming, particularly when the client feels strongly that the other side is wrong. My job is to help separate what's legally important from what's understandably irritating.

What is the difference between a client who handles litigation well and one who doesn't?

The clients who handle litigation well are willing to hear things they don't necessarily want to hear. They understand that our job isn't to agree with them; it's to help them make good decisions.
