Richard S. The Electricity Advisory Committee serves as an important component of the DOE's strategy to improve its research and development portfolio and program activities. The group reports to the DOE's Assistant Secretary for Electricity and meets three times a year to advise DOE on a variety of electricity issues. "The EAC's advice, insights, and thoughtful feedback all dramatically improve DOE's electricity initiatives. The combination of industry stakeholders plus the capabilities of DOE and the National Labs enhances our ability to identify and solve future electricity challenges," said Assistant Secretary Bruce Walker.

During their two-year term, the EAC members will advise DOE on current and future electric grid reliability, resilience, security, sector interdependence, and policy issues. They will periodically review and make recommendations on DOE electric grid-related programs and initiatives, including electricity-related R&D programs and modeling efforts. Members will also identify emerging issues related to electricity production and delivery and advise on Federal coordination with utility industry authorities in the event of supply disruptions and other emergencies.
