Overview: It is hard to call per- and polyfluoroalkyl substances (PFAS) a category of “emerging” contaminants given the amount of attention PFAS is receiving these days, but the regulation of PFAS throughout the country is certainly still developing. Pennsylvania is the latest jurisdiction to propose drinking water standards for PFAS. The Fireside Chat will discuss Pennsylvania's proposed standard, how it compares to other standards throughout the country, what it means for the regulated community, and what comes next.
